The first part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the various methods which have been proposed for the determination of the rate of reaction between a radical and a molecule. The most common of these is the method of initial rates, in which the initial concentration of the radical is varied and the initial rate of reaction is measured. This method is simple and direct, but it is subject to a number of errors, particularly those arising from the determination of the initial concentration of the radical. A more accurate method is the method of continuous variation, in which the concentration of the radical is varied and the rate of reaction is measured at a constant concentration of the molecule. This method is more complicated, but it is more accurate than the method of initial rates.
 The second part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the various factors which influence the rate of reaction between a radical and a molecule. These factors include the nature of the radical, the nature of the molecule, the temperature, and the concentration of the reactants. The rate of reaction is generally increased by increasing the temperature and by increasing the concentration of the reactants. The nature of the radical and the nature of the molecule also influence the rate of reaction, but these factors are more difficult to quantify.
